As a consequence, among other schemes, in 1875 a military road was out along the north-east coast to the south of Keelung on which duced to submit to Chinese rule. There were frequent fights between the recalcitrant aboriginal tribes and the Chinese troops in 1875, however, in which the former frequently had the advantage by surprising and cutting off bodies of Chinese soldiers. The latter had little relish for the fight, for they were dreadful havoc in their ranks. At about 3.30 yesterday morning many people in Hongkong were roused from their slumbers by the pealing of the alarm bells, which indicated that a conflagration had broken out in the western district. The fire engines were got out as quickly as possible, and the Volunteer and Government Fire Brigades mustered, but before they got down to the scene of the outbreak-the flames had obtained such a hold that it was evident a good deal of damage would be done before they could be got under.
